Let them remember that whilst the progressionists of 1861 were pointing at France and using the Gloire as a mere lever with which to cross-lift Berkeleys and Greys into iron and armoured structures, the old-school men pointed to America, and that navy which must ever claim a high position in the opinion of British naval officers, and they speciously urged that so practical a people, unhampered by hereditary Whig or Tory Lords of the Admiralty, and with no caste of Brahmins from which their Secretaries of the Navy were especially drawn, had not as yet considered it necessary to construct a single armour-clad war-ship, and asked, Why should we do so? How silent such critics were when within a year a terrible and unexpected conflict...
